Market update:

Fed meeting on Wednesday last week where, as expected, they held rates where they were. Jerome Powell was extremely dovish and essentially said the increasing inflation that we have seen so far this year doesn't matter. So with that information it stands to reason that the Fed is going to do what market is predicting which is begin cutting rates in June. In that scenario I expect the market to continue to be bullish at least until the election with nothing but the occasional minor pull back. In reality I think this extremely short sighted by the fed when you consider the extremely loose fiscal policy of the current administration. If the recent increase in inflation turn out to be the trend and not just a blip and we ease monetary policy then the next few years are going to be extremely volatile because at some point the Fed will need to backtrack and ultimately begin another tightening cycle. Granted all of this will take time to play out and for now it seems its business as usual and as long as the Fed continues doing whatever the market wants regardless of the data then the market will continue the record setting run that we have seen recently.
